Program Information

The Department of New Media and Communication offers an undergraduate program that aims to explore the impact of new media technologies on cultural and social developments. Our medium of education is English. The curriculum is designed to foster an interdisciplinary approach to the contemporary media landscape, where “old” and emergent forms of media continuously converge and evolve. Drawing on intersecting perspectives that fall under the broad category of social sciences, students will learn to critically engage with issues that arise from new media developments and become aware of their roles as both consumers and producers of media.
